Content

The course highlights the production of fashion as a symbolic, sociocultural, and material phenomenon. The aim of the course is to give an in-depth understanding of the production of fashion as a symbolic, identity-shaping marker and the production of fashion as a material product, as distinct but still deeply interrelated phenomena. The course underscores in particular the emergence and interaction between fashion systems and the textile industry in a modern and late modern context in a global perspective. Emphasis is also placed on the dynamic between fashion as associated with the international generation of fashion novelties and trends on the one hand, and the cultural anchoring of the locally specific, which includes fashion capitals as well as places of textile production, on the other. By clarifying the deeper mechanics of these phenomena and their shifting cultural contexts, a more complete and nuanced understanding of contemporary field of fashion is provided.
